Stomacher[1] (stʊˑmătʃəɹ, stʊˑmăkəɹ). Forms: 5 stomakere, stomechere, stomachyr, 5–6 stomachere, 5–6, 8 stomager, 6 stomackger, (8 stomatcher), 6– stomacher [app. f. Stomach sb. + -er[1]: but see below.

The alleged F. estomachier appears to be recorded only by Palsgrave. If it be genuine, and the source of the Eng. word, it would account for the pronunciation (stʊˑmătʃəɹ), which is given in the pronouncing dictionaries of Kenrick (1773), Sheridan (1780), Walker (1791), Smart (1836), Worcester (1860), in Cassell's Encyclopædic Dict. (1888), and in Webster's Dict. (1828–1886). The genuineness of this pronunciation is attested by the spellings stomager (1450, 1727), stomackger (1575), stomatcher (17..), and stomacher (c 1450 onwards): the spelling with k is evidenced only once (c 1466), though the word occurs frequently in writers who wrote the word stomach with k. The pronunciation (stʊˑmăkəɹ) was given by Ogilvie Imperial Dict. (1850) and appears in later editions of that work and in recent U.S. dicts. It is not impossible that estomachier was really formed in late Anglo-French, and is the source of the Eng. word. For the sense cf. the misuse of stomach for 'chest' (Stomach sb. 3).]

b. In Great Britain from about 1850; the word has been current in the designation co-operative store, denoting the shop in which a co-operative trading society exposes goods for sale (originally to its own members only, but now usually also to the outside public). In imitation of this use, the plural ('—'s Stores', '— & Co's Stores') is often adopted as the designation of a trading establishment resembling 'The Stores' in extent and in multifariousness of business.

Story, sb.[2], storey (stōᵊri). Pl. stories, storeys. Forms: 5 storye, 6 storie, (storrie, store), 7– storey, ? 4, 5– story. [First in AL. form historia; hence prob. the same word as Story sb.[1], though the development of sense is obscure.

Possibly historia as an architectural term may originally have denoted a tier of painted windows or of sculptures on the front of a building: see Story sb.[1] 8, and cf. the Latin quot. 1398 below and sense 2.

The current view that the word is a. OF. estoree* (f. estorer to build, furnish: see Store v.) is untenable on account of the AL. form historia (from 12th c.).

The following are examples of the Anglo-Latin use of historia in the architectural sense:—

1. Each of the stages or portions one above the other of which a building consists; a room or set of rooms on one floor or level.

In this use synonymous with Floor sb. 5; but while in England the term First-floor is applied to the floor above the ground-floor, the numbering of 'stories' (so named) usually begins with the ground floor, so that the 'first-floor' is identical with the 'second story,' and 'a house of one story' has a ground-floor only. A different usage is shown in quot. 1850, and appears to be not wholly obsolete.

Quot. a 1400, though the reading is app. the scribe's conjectural emendation of an obscure passage, may perh. be taken as attesting the existence of the sh. at the date of the MS.; the passage was prob. supposed to refer to the addition of 'stories' or upper stages to towers.

21. To strain at: to make a difficulty of 'swallowing' or accepting (something); to scruple at. Also (rarely), †to strain to do something.

This use is due to misunderstanding of the phrase 'strain at a gnat' in Matt. xxiii. 24. It has been asserted that 'straine at' in the Bible of 1611 is a misprint for 'straine out', the rendering of earlier versions (see 14 c). But quots. 1583 and 1594 show that the translators of 1611 simply adopted a rendering that had already obtained currency. It was not a mistranslation, the meaning intended being 'which strain the liquor if they find a gnat in it'. The phrase, however, was early misapprehended (perh. already by Shaks. in quot. 1609), the verb being supposed to mean 'to make violent effort' (see sense 18).

2. Phrases. a. To make bricks without straw : said with allusion to Exodus v.

The current form and application of the saying are hardly justified by the narrative. The Israelites were not required to make bricks without straw (which was an indispensable binding material for sun-dried bricks[1]), but to gather the straw for themselves instead of having it furnished to them. The phrase, however, now commonly means '(to be required) to produce results without the means usually considered necessary'. Cf. the accurate use in quot. 1661.

1658 in Verney Mem. (1907) II. 79 It is an hard task to make bricks without straw. 1661 Dk. Ormonde in 11th Rep. Hist. MSS. Comm. App. v. 10 If they will not let that [act] passe..and yet will have us keepe armys, is it not requireing a tale of bricks, without allowing the straw. 1874 L. Stephen Hours in Library I. vi. 271 It is often good for us to have to make bricks without straw. 1883 Miss M. Betham-Edwards Disarmed I. I. 5 The fact is, you are fast being spoiled. But your task from to-day will be to make bricks without straw. No appeal shall induce me to have pity on you.

b. In the straw : in childbed, lying-in. So out of the straw, recovered after childbearing.

In quot. 1786 the phrase is taken to refer to the practice of laying down straw (to deaden noise) before a house where there is a confinement. It is doubtful whether this was the original meaning, though the practice was common.

b. With prefixed word, forming the proper name of a street. Abbreviated St., st.

In early examples these appellations were originally descriptive, as in the Broad street, the High street. (In some towns, a name of this type still retains the definite article.) In modern nomenclature, the choice of the prefixed word is often arbitrary.

Modern usage is divided as to the writing of these names with hyphen or as two words. (In the 16–17th c. they were not unfrequently written as one word, e.g. 'Limestreete', Stow Surv. ed. 1603, p. 152.) It is to be observed that names ending in street are always stressed on the prefixed element, while those ending in road or lane have level stress: cf., e.g., Pa'rk-street with Pa'rk-la'ne, Pa'rk-roa'd.

1855 W. J. M. Rankine Misc. Sci. Papers (1881) 120 In this paper, the word 'Strain' will be used to denote the change of volume and figure constituting the deviation of a molecule of a solid from that condition which it preserves when free from the action of external forces; and the word 'Stress' will be used to denote the force, or combination of forces, which such a molecule exerts in tending to recover its free condition, and which, for a state of equilibrium, is equal and opposite to the combination of external forces applied to it. 1856 Thomson in Phil. Trans. CXLVI. 481 A stress is an equilibrating application of force to a body. Ibid. note, It will be seen that I have deviated slightly from Mr. Rankine's definition of the word 'stress,' as I have applied it to the direct action experienced by a body from the matter around it, and not, as proposed by him, to the elastic reaction of the body equal and opposite to that action. 1873 R. H. Bow Economics of Construction 45 note, The term stress expresses the condition of a part of the structure to the extremities of which are applied compressing or extending forces; the amount of the stress is measured by the magnitude of the force acting on either extremity; the strain is the change of length from elasticity which the part undergoes when subjected to the stress. 1873 Maxwell Electr. & Magn. I. 59 The nature of this stress [in dielectrics] is..a tension along the lines of force combined with an equal pressure in all directions at right angles to these lines. 1896 Greener Gun (ed. 6) 545 The stresses upon a gun are a radial stress or 'pressure'; a tangential stress, or hoop tension..; a longitudinal stress. 1911 J. A. Ewing in *Encycl.
